in. as second-class matter.)

The curious wayfarer of our time who urns aside from the traveled highway of land or river, and strays by the site of the once stately mansion of Belvoir will find only fallen walls, blackened hearth stones and mounds of briargrown rubbish and gnarled trees to mark the historic spot where through many years went on the long since forcotten routine of domestic and social incidents of colonial life.

which would be fraught with so much interest to the present generation only the most fragmentary accounts have come down to us through either writn record or oral tradition. Only here and there a vague memory, some familiar names, some brief letters and tiggity and loveliness and gallant ex-ven, are lost sight of and no longer lwell in living story. Let them so re-nain, bright images gilded by the sunight of the shadowy past, and clad in iden by the distance but their frail-

We know that in connection with Mount Version this home of the Fairaxes was one of the chief so ial centres the upper Tidewater region of the Od Dominion," with always ten doors and a generous hostitality for the coming guest. We know that within its walls our Washington was an oft times presence through all the years of its existence. From Mount Vernon it was but a few minutes' sail, or pull with the oars; and well be knew how to handle both. Here it was that he first met the charming Miss Cary, sister of Mrs. George Wm. Fairfax, and became conscious for the first time in his stripling years of the coveted privilege of being a suitor and claimant for the heart and hand of the young lady by the stern and unyielding father who failed at the time to perceive in the young aspirant a split of the city for a grocery. ntemplating for his daughter. "My heiress," said the haughty old cavalier,
"has been used to riding in her chariot, attended by servants." The love lorn youth pressed no more his claim after such an unexpected reverse, and never saw the object of his affection but once afterward. That was when he nodded to her pallid and fainting visage as she good in the window of the old capital of Williamsburg when riding through its streets on his triumphal march, with waving banners and music play-irg, from the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. We know also that Thomas, Lord Fairfax, the great proor, the scholar and graduate of Oxford and the friend of Addison—the whilom devotee of fashion and saiety in old Loudoun town, and the jilted and inconsolable lover was for years a dweller under the same hospital roof. We know too that in those halls were gravely talked over and considered by many great minds of the time various measures for the weal of the infant colony preparatory to their proposal and final enactment in the House of Burgesses at the vice regal capital of Williamsburg. We know that many a teast was spread in the banqueting ball of that home for huntsmen returning with trophies from the chase of the fox and the deer. But this is well nigh all of the story which has come down to us through the long lapse of years of life in the House of Belvoir. The rest of it for the most part is silent The rest of it for the most part is silent and beyond recall with the dust of the actors then and there. Some stray fragments of it may still be preserved in musty letters and other forgotten papers in old lofts and garrets, some time marklan to be reserved and un-time, may hap, to be rescued and unfolded for the curious reader by patient faithful chroniclers yet to come. But in our fondness for all such reminiscences of the olden times we may go back in imagination through the dim and shadowy vistas of the past and giving loose rein to fancy let it summon up and reincarnate for us the many other guests of high degree who came and went over those threshholds as
